Although technology brought by multinational corporations and the newly privatized domestic telecommunications industry is an important factor in reducing poverty, the policy of liberalizing international telecommunications is clearly essential. Telecommunications infrastructure, being expensive, tends to be provided in big technology-driven big investments. For this reason, instead of privatizing telecommunications, only a few (e.g., Internet technology) should be left to the market and be subject to regulation. This is wrong in light of enough successful models, as testified by the Internet economy, which has led to a dramatic growth of small enterprises. It should be supported by government and state technology.
