Research shows that male homosexuals suffer from depression at a higher rate than the general population. Research also shows that the prevalence of depression is higher in gay men than in straight men. The reason for this is not clear, but it may be related to the fact that gay men are often stigmatized and discriminated against. This can lead to feelings of isolation and loneliness, which can contribute to depression. Additionally, the stress of coming out and dealing with societal expectations can also play a role. It is important for gay men to seek support and therapy if they are experiencing depression.

¹ In addition, Macgregor & Goodwin (1998), who have also recently reviewed large, random, English-speaking populations, reported considerable cross-nationality variation in the prevalence of depression, with the highest rates observed in Japan, Finland, Sweden, and the Netherlands.
